State Budgets and Critical Policies Put at Risk by Republican Government Shutdown

SALEM, Ore. – Legislators continue to work in the Capitol despite House and Senate Republicans walking off the job to shut down the government.

The Joint Committee on Ways and Means has advanced a series of budget bills that will fund critical needs across the State. These bills will address the state's housing and homelessness crisis, fragmented behavioral health system, looming wildfire season, and other targeted investments. These investments will only be able to move forward this session if Republicans return to the Capitol and agree to finish all of the work that has been blocked by their repeated walkouts.

"These budgets are remarkable pieces of legislation. They benefit every corner of Oregon – every Oregonian," Senate President Peter Courtney said. "The fact that a few members are preventing us from carrying out our oaths of office, preventing us from voting on bills and budgets, is heartbreaking. We have stayed in the Capitol. We have worked. We have done literally all we can do without a quorum. It's time for my fellow legislators to return to work and uphold their oaths."

The budget bills join a long list of critical policy bills that have been worked through the legislative process, including public hearings, written testimony, amendment debates and committee approval.

"We come to work in the Legislature each day because the work we do matters to the lives of Oregonians," House Speaker Tina Kotek said. "All of the policy bills and budget items that have earned support through the legislative process deserve floor votes this session. I continue to talk to the House Republican Leader every day and still hope that they will return to the Capitol and agree to finish all of this important work for the people of Oregon.”

The final budget bills, as well as policy bills with appropriations, have all now moved out of the joint budget committee. These are the highlights of investments that are in danger because of the Republican shutdown:
